Glen Klinkhart: computer interest led to crime-solving

Glen Klinkhart '88

Homicide investigation is much more than a job to Glen Klinkhart '88. "It's something you are, not something you do," he said. "In order to be good at it, you have to give up a lot."

The Anchorage detective's most famous case took such a toll that Klinkhart is taking "a break from blood and guts." He currently serves as assistant police chief. And he's writing a book, Finding Bethany.

Bethany Correira was 21 in 2003, when her disappearance set off Anchorage's biggest missing-person search ever. Exactly a year later, her body was found in the woods. Correira's apartment manager, Michael Lawson, was convicted of second-degree murder. Klinkhart broke the case, eliciting a confession from the gunman's brother.

Klinkhart has described the case on national television, including an extensive interview on ABC's Dateline aired last year.

The case had an uncanny link to personal tragedy. Correira was killed May 3, the birthday of Klinkhart's sister, who was slain at age 16 the year Correira was born, 1981.

During the year of searching for Correira, Klinkhart's son, now 10, constantly asked about her.

"We'd be driving along when I had a weekend off — her picture was on every lamp post and every stop sign," Klinkhart said. "My son would be in the back seat, and he'd say, 'Hey Dad, there's Bethany.' Dropping him off the first day at kindergarten, I was very aware at that moment in time what the Correiras had been through, sending their daughter to the big city for college."

Klinkhart, who started a computer crime unit at the Anchorage Police Department and also owns a computer security company, was focused on computers when he enrolled at Linfield. During college, he developed an interest in business. After receiving his business degree, Klinkhart started a computer graphics firm.

He illustrated two books and worked in advertising before entering law enforcement. Partly influenced by his sister's murder, he was seeking a new challenge and something more meaningful than making money. He found a niche as a detective: "All the domestic violence, along with child abuse, those are the cases where you could see an instant result — take a woman out of a potentially lethal situation and at least know for the night she was safe."

Assistant District Attorney Sharon Marshall, who worked closely with Klinkhart on the Correira case, described him as one of her favorite colleagues. "He is somebody I can always turn to — he finds the answers or finds somebody who can," she said. "Glen puts 100 percent into any case he's working on."

Besides his continued computer fascination, Klinkhart's Linfield experience still affects him.

"I think that one of the really wonderful things about Linfield that really stayed with me is the connections I made with people from all different places and the ability to spend quality time with people not cut from the same mold as you," he said. "I had the opportunity to change course, to take classes in business, and they were interested in what I had to say about using computers. I was invited to help teach classes — an opportunity I would never have gotten at a large university."
