New spin on PR

Lisa (Mortimer) Sherwin '97

If you ask Lisa (Mortimer) Sherwin '97 how she accomplished her most recent career coup, she'll tell you:

"The sun, the moon and the stars all aligned perfectly and it took a lot of hard work."

Sherwin recently launched a new public relations practice for VTM Inc., a global marketing, communications and consulting company based in Portland.

With a degree in mass communication from Linfield and five years' PR experience in Portland, Sherwin was prepared for the challenge when she joined VTM in 2002. At a time when the public relations industry was sagging, she created PR services that clearly target client goals and that use value pricing – billing by the project instead of by the hour.

"We wanted to create something that was very different from other PR firms," she explained.

That difference has been successful. Since August of 2002, the VTM PR practice has grown from one to five people and secured seven new clients. In March, VTM PR was recognized by the Portland Business Journal as one of the top 25 PR firms in Portland. VTM was also recently selected as one of Oregon Business Magazine's 2004 "100 Best Companies to Work for in Oregon."

Sherwin travels frequently, both within the United States and internationally. But her favorite part of the job has been watching the growth of the group, which has expanded to add four people.

Sherwin said Linfield's small class sizes and faculty interaction prepared her for the work she does today. She is also thankful to Professor William Lingle and Emeritus Professor Dave Gilbert, mentors in the Mass Communication Department.

"They were driven people who believed in me," Sherwin said. "They knew I had something they could polish, and they were accessible outside of class. I appreciated being a name and not a number."

She is modest about her achievements.

"We all have our own successes in our lives – I look around and see fellow alumni with new families, winning awards or starting new businesses," Sherwin said. "I don't think what I'm doing is any more successful than anyone else. So many Linfield alumni are making a difference."

Bond urges nation to "think small"

Phil Bond '78

Phil Bond '78 followed an older brother to Linfield. But soon the California runner was making tracks of his own as a half-miler conference champion and record holder. And he began pursuing lifelong interests as a communication major.

Bond said he took advantage of every opportunity during his Linfield years, working in sports information, serving as sports editor for the college newspaper and play-by-play radio announcing for McMinnville High School football.

"I think what I came out of Linfield equipped with was a wide range of communication skills and a wide range of curiosity from the liberal arts background," Bond said.

"It brought me where I am today."

Today he is undersecretary of commerce for technology and chief of staff to Donald Evans, the U.S. secretary of commerce. Previously, he was director of federal public policy for Hewlett-Packard Co. Last December, he was honored as one of the 2003 Scientific American 50 for his policy work in nanotechnology.

"In many ways, my job is to be able to communicate and interpret cutting-edge technology in a way that policy-makers can understand," he said. The Commerce Department supports research on nanotechnology through the National Institute of Standards and Technology. Bond's job is to persuade government leaders to think small. Like submolecular. As he explains, 80,000 nanometers is about the width of a human hair. A molecule of DNA is about 2.5 nanometers.

Nanotechnology allows building from the bottom up, in the smallest of units, leaving minimal waste. And it will revolutionize manufacturing, health care and education, Bond said.

"It's a completely different way of looking at things," he said. "It's more efficient, with fewer byproducts, so it's environmentally healthier for us."

Bond, who was sworn in as under secretary shortly after the 9/11 attacks, said nanotechnology is being applied in developing anti-terrorism devices. These will detect chemical, biological and radiological weapons from a great distance. Nanotechnology also will help equip tomorrow's soldier with protective clothing.

Remembering service and sacrifice

They've been friends for more than 70 years – through childhood, college, a war and now, volunteer efforts.

Two World War II veterans, Lieutenant Tom Maloney '46 and Captain Colin Armstrong '51, had a chance to reflect on their friendship and the war that shaped their lives, when they attended the dedication of the National World War II Memorial in Washington, D.C., on May 29. Evergreen International Aviation sponsored the trip for four veterans, all volunteers at the Evergreen Aviation Museum, including Maloney and Armstrong.

The group was among more than 150,000 people who attended the dedication ceremony. The memorial honors the 16 million people who served in the armed forces of the U.S., the more than 400,000 who died and all who supported the war effort from home.

For Maloney, the experience was, “inspirational and quite touching. I thought about how we were there and all our friends who were killed were not.”

Maloney was 20 and had attended Linfield for three years when he joined the U.S. Naval Reserve in October 1941 as a dive bomber pilot. Two months later, Japan attacked Pearl Harbor. During his four years of service, he was awarded 14 service medals, including two navy crosses, one distinguished flying cross and five air medals.

Maloney lost a number of friends and family members during the war including Linfield classmates Jimmy Breeding '39 and Gilbert Roberts '41.

“We had more egotism and confidence than we had brains,” he said. “Inside of us, we had the feeling we were all supermen. When I came back, I had matured. I was 26 going on 56.”

Maloney returned to Linfield and finished his degree in 1946, marrying Nita (Glascoe) '48 later that year. Returning veterans changed the climate of Linfield's campus, Nita noted.

Captain Colin Armstrong '51

“Most of the veterans smoked and danced,” she said. “Within a few years, rules changed on campus, too.”

Armstrong agreed, adding “things were much more strict and proper before the war. The attitude was more relaxed and informal when I returned.”

Armstrong entered the navy in 1942 as a dive bomber pilot, fulfilling a lifelong dream.

“Becoming a navy pilot was my career ambition,” he said. “Seldom do you know that and get to do it. I was lucky that way.”

After the war, Armstrong earned a business administration degree at Linfield before continuing his career in the military, serving as a carrier pilot, meteorologist and oceanographer. He spent the next two years forecasting ice in the Arctic Ocean, and went on to serve a total of 30 years, earning 14 service medals along the way. After retiring from the military, Armstrong was a Yamhill County commissioner for eight years.

that the nursing school has developed will be important to the current project's success, from the middle schools where Linfield has a long-established mentoring program to community organizations that provide sites for clinical experiences. One such partnership was established this past summer, when the Oregon Health Career Center held its Summer Enrichment Academy for Careers in Health on Linfield's Portland Campus. Linfield also works with Las Hermanas, a program that encourages Hispanic students to complete high school and enter college programs, and the National Association of Hispanic Nurses.

Josie Rodriguez, director of cultural liaison at Silverton Hospital, has long been one of Linfield's partners. She praises Wros and the other nursing school faculty she has worked with for their efforts and their sincerity.

“They come to us,” she says. “They seek advice from the stakeholders.” Rodriguez believes this project will have a direct impact on health disparities and a number of beneficial ripple effects on the Hispanic community.

The grant fully funds the Linfield program for three years, with $186,343 provided for this year and amounts of $172,721 and $196,664 recommended for years two and three respectively.
