Swisher puts tech skills to work at courthouse

As a political science major at Linfield College, Mae Swisher '08 imagined a career in state government.

But when she applied for a position with the Oregon Judicial Department, they offered her a job she didn't expect – as a computer technician.

Swisher said her Linfield experience, both inside and outside the classroom, sealed the deal.

"What mattered was that I had a liberal arts degree and I was trainable," said Swisher, who has already been promoted.

Interviewers also spied Swisher's four years of work study experience in the Linfield Integrated Technology Services Department. Although she worked her way through college solving computer problems, it didn't occur to Swisher to pursue a career in that field.

Now a computer technician for the Oregon Judicial Department, Swisher is based at the Multnomah County Courthouse. In addition to working on hardware and software issues, she also serves as secretary for the Technical Advisory Committee, a state-wide group for computer technicians. The position was a natural transition from her student government work at Linfield, where she served as secretary for the Associated Students of Linfield College.

"I've found a niche that I like," she said. "It's the perfect intersection of my skills and interests. Technology is a growing Irv Wiswall, chief technology officer and Swisher's former supervisor, is not surprised by her success.

"The liberal arts education teaches you how to learn and to be flexible and to communicate," said Wiswall. "That's an awful lot of what Mae is good at."
