Inside Linfield Magazine

When Peter Richardson was named Oregon Professor of the Year, we felt a deep sense of pride for him and for the college. He has touched countless students throughout his career and represents the quality of teaching that people have come to expect at Linfield. Caring faculty who invest time and energy in students are key to Linfield’s success. We will introduce you to Chris Keaveney, Linfield’s “Asia guy,” as we explore the college’s growing ties to nations across the Pacific. You’ll also read about political science Professor Patrick Cottrell, who brings a perspective honed from living and working abroad. You’ll learn about current students, two from Moldova who are completing nursing degrees and another who interned with the Miami Dolphins. As a new decade begins, we look forward to sharing more stories about excellent teachers, interesting students and successful alumni.

Features

6 One of the nation’s best
Peter Richardson, professor of German at Linfield for more than 30 years, was recognized as one of the nation’s best teachers when he was named Oregon Professor of the Year in November.

9 Putting medical skills to work
Iuri and Maia Cernev, both ’10, may not be able to work as doctors in the United States, but they will put their medical skills to work when they complete their nursing degrees at the Linfield-Good Samaritan School of Nursing.

10 Looking west to find the East
Increasingly, Linfield is looking west to East Asia. Through a variety of partnerships and programming, Linfield is bridging the gap between McMinnville and the Asian continent to benefit global learners.

18 Educating citizens of the world
Patrick Cottrell has worked and lived around the world. His experience and expertise help students engage and understand the diverse issues facing the United States and the international community.
