2009

Table of Contents

Linfield Magazine Staff

Follow this and additional works at: https://digitalcommons.linfield.edu/linfield_magazine

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://digitalcommons.linfield.edu/linfield_magazine/vol6/iss1/3

This article is brought to you for free via open access, courtesy of DigitalCommons@Linfield. For more information, please contact digitalcommons@linfield.edu.
Teaching students how to live

Our nation’s second President, John Adams, contended, “There are two types of education. One should teach us how to make a living, and the other how to live.” At Linfield College we strive to provide both forms of education, but the second is much more important than the first.

We just held commencement at Linfield. It was a glorious, sun-soaked day, with the largest number of graduates in the college’s history. Despite anxiety about the job market, students celebrated on the commencement green and in the Oak Grove. Graduates tearfully hugged faculty and expressed their thanks. Families cheered as their loved ones crossed the stage. There were wry comments about the unemployment rate and the economy, but the air was filled with optimism.

I don’t think the optimism was misplaced, for our graduates are prepared to make a living, and they have learned how to live. In some cases, they have been trained for specific professions — accounting, nursing or teaching for example. In other fields, they may not have been trained for a particular profession, but they have acquired the skills that will make them successful employees and leaders: they have learned how to think critically, to communicate clearly, and to work with others. In fact, liberal arts majors often become the leaders of companies, even if they haven’t pursued a specific profession, but they have acquired the skills that will make them successful employees and leaders: they have learned how to think critically, to communicate clearly, and to work with others.

But it’s learning how to live that is at the heart of what we do at Linfield. As I shook the hands of our students crossing the stage, I found myself remembering what this class had already accomplished: January Term service courses in Cameroon and Guatemala, publications in national journals; championships in a variety of sports; regional and national recognition in the arts; creation of small businesses; and successful applications to medical school, law school and graduate school. Tiffany Cook, Chris Schulte, Rafe Rafahi and Wesley Mitchell will go into business. Lizzie Martinez will work for a non-profit organization that educates Mexican orphans. Kendra Strafhn will become a medical doctor. Carrie Krizcek is now a patients’ right advocate. At commencement we gave an honorary degree to David Lett, the founder of Oregon’s pinot noir industry. Because David passed away in October, his son Jason accepted the award on his behalf. As he spoke about his father, Jason described the piece of paper that David always carried with him and eventually passed on to his son. It contained the words of Henry David Thoreau: “If one advances confidently in the direction of his dreams, and endeavors to live the life which he has imagined, he will meet with a success unexpected in common hours….

“Green” has become the new catchword. But for many individuals, businesses and organizations, it is more than just a passing fad. In this issue, meet a student leader whose passion, lifestyle and future career take “green” to a new level. You will also learn about steps Linfield has taken to reduce its carbon footprint through classroom projects and langrange planning. You’ll read how a student’s internship thrust him into the world of animation and the production of a major film. We introduce you to Dean Victoria McGillin and learn some of her views after her first 11 months at Linfield. You’ll get a look at some stunning views of Mount Kilimanjaro as we follow four Linfield alumni on a research expedition. And we say farewell to professors who are retiring after serving the college for many years. While this has been a challenging year for many in our community, we look ahead to continuing Linfield’s rich tradition of academic excellence. Join us.

On the cover: Duncan Reid ’10 (Juan Calvillo photo)