COSMOPOLITAN GOES INTERCULTURAL

by Kara Barlow

This project focused on an analysis of the messages portrayed through four covers of Cosmopolitan’s international magazines in November of 2015. This study investigated if and how Cosmopolitan creates a single, worldwide ideal image for women. Using Arthur Asa Berger’s method of semiotic analysis, the four covers were analyzed according to five categories: the model’s story or significance in the world today, the model’s race, clothing and other artifacts worn by the model, the model’s body language, and the words and phrases printed on the cover. This study uncovered three consistent, major themes: sex, fitness, and success in terms of wealth. The ideologies contained in these themes are spread across the countries in which Cosmopolitan distributes their magazine, giving women worldwide the idea that these are the expectations of their gender and that these values should be embraced. The study suggests that if all themes represented in the covers portray and glorify U.S. centric values there is potential to override or devalue the cultural values of other countries in which the magazine is distributed.

CONCLUSION

- The messages portrayed by Cosmopolitan on their U.S. and international covers communicate a single ideal image to which women are encouraged to aspire.

- Although Cosmopolitan caters somewhat to particular cultures, there are still common expectations or themes intermixed among the various magazine covers. These include sex, fitness, and success.

- Since these themes appear to be grounded in U.S. centric values there is potential to override or devalue the values of other countries to which the magazine is exported.
