Downs finds fulfillment on island of Sumba

Kathryn Kiekel Downs’ 82 (standing), along with her family, tours the Sumba Foundation, dedicated to improving the health and education of the Sumbanese people.

Kathryn Kiekel Downs’ 82, her husband, Sean, felt blessed with career success, two children and a beautiful home in Laguna Hills, Calif. But they began to question the significance of their lives. A search for meaning and the perfect wave led Sean, a surfer, to the island of Sumba. And there, the couple found a new purpose: helping some of Indonesia’s poorest people. They now run the nonprofit Sumba Foundation, dedicated to improving the islanders’ health and education while respecting their traditions.

It has been an interesting journey, say Downs, who majored in business at Linfield and previously worked as an evening gown buyer for Nordstrom. Her ties to the college run deep: an uncle, Bob Kiekel, taught math at Gresham High School. His daughter, Jane (Lemieux) Koeck, is owner and president of McDonald Homes. Scott retired from teaching in Gresham. Their daughter, Anneliese, is a surfer, to the island of Sumba. And there, the couple founded the foundation that has been in operation since 1990.
