2005

Alumni Profile

Beth Rogers Thompson

Follow this and additional works at: http://digitalcommons.linfield.edu/linfield_magazine

Recommended Citation
Available at: http://digitalcommons.linfield.edu/linfield_magazine/vol2/iss1/16

This article is brought to you for free via open access, courtesy of DigitalCommons@Linfield. For more information, please contact digitalcommons@linfield.edu.
Lila Astenbrenner received her liberal arts degree from Linfield in 1974, a year of economic dolefulness. She saw her lack of specialization as a strength, not a weakness. “So many people were graduating and not getting jobs back then. I thought it would be better to be well rounded. And it couldn’t have worked out better.”

She graduated with no career goals, but with an open mind. After working in a veterinary clinic for several years, she got to know a Washington County sheriff’s deputy, who invited her on a ride-along. One thing led to another, and eventually she was working with animals again — on the Hillsboro Police Department’s K-9 unit. She was the only woman hired by the department and at that time the only female K-9 officer in Oregon.

“Talk about a branch not falling far from the tree,” she said, laughing at her entrenchment in this corner of Oregon. “Our mayor right now was our high school student teacher” at Aloha High School.

She may not have ventured far from home, but Astenbrenner has worked in some exciting areas of law enforcement — narcotics and undercover operations, as well as public information and administration. She has risen steadily through the ranks in nearly 28 years with the department, from patrol to detective, sergeant, lieutenant, captain and commander, culminating in her promotion to Hillsboro’s deputy chief in 2003.

Now that she’s spending more time at a desk, she said, she misses the immediacy of being on the streets. “You never knew what you were going to be doing next,” she said. “And I really enjoyed narcotics. It always felt good to put the bad guys away.”

But the work is not always as glamorous and high-tech as it is portrayed on television. “I wish we really felt good to put the bad guys away.”

Turner may not have found many African Americans at Linfield, but he did find a caring, supportive environment. “The people at Linfield were helpful, they were nurturing, they respected me, and I respected them. I don’t think I could have survived if the environment wasn’t warm and conducive for me at that time.”

Turner did return to Connecticut, but not in defeat. After receiving his B.A. in sociology from Linfield, he earned a master’s degree in social work from the University of Connecticut, before returning to the West Coast, completing a Ph.D. in higher education administration/public policy at Stanford.

Many scholars base articles and books on their doctoral dissertations; Turner has built a successful career on his. It is Turner’s dedication to public service that has allowed him to make such a significant impact. He continues to work with African American students at White Institutions, helping them achieve their goals and reach their full potential. He has built a successful career on his dedication to public service, helping African American students achieve their goals and reach their full potential.

“When there was nothing on television that was interesting, I would go to school and talk to the students. I would tell them about the things I was doing.”

Turner can empathize with the students he counsels. He knows life can be tough, but he makes it clear that he has high expectations. He would like to see Virginia’s African American enrollment climb to 14% to 15%; it has held steady at about 9 percent since 2000. But, he says, “When you get a critical mass, which we have at the University of Virginia, it’s much easier — when students can see other students that look like them, and see them succeeding.”

Turner believes that students should be encouraged to pursue their goals and reach their full potential. He has built a successful career on his dedication to public service, helping African American students achieve their goals and reach their full potential.

Mike Turner, dean of the Office of African-American Affairs, kicked off Black History Month with his inaugural State of African-American Affairs address at the University of Virginia last year.

Turner shares the lessons learned

When Rick Turner ’63 entered Linfield, he was one of only seven African-American students. He knew he had entered a world far different from his urban home-town, Hartford, Conn. He knew acquaintances back home were saying he’d soon return in defeat. He was determined to prove them wrong.

Turner came on a basketball scholarship, thanks to his high school coach’s friendship with Paul Durham ’36, then Linfield athletic director. Curtis Manns ’62, who had graduated from Weaver High a year ahead of Turner, had come to play football.

“Turner called Linfield a ‘saving grace.’ He had to overcome academic deficiencies and loneliness. He was 17 years old and 3,000 miles from familiar faces.”

“In retrospect, I’m really thankful for the opportunity to go to Linfield,” says Turner. “I know it made me a better person. These were the most important four years of my life because I learned how to endure. It made me a stronger person.”

“Friends and family”

Fullday (Maryam) Dressel ’94 of McMinnville, March 12

Friends and family”

Eldad (David) Shabb ’84 of Springfield, March 12

Friends and family”

Louise (Darby) Shaw ’84 of Springfield, March 12

Friends and family”

Jeni Aaby ’04 of Bothell, March 12

Friends and family”

Daniel Kalie ’70 of Tigard, April 10

Friends and family”

Earle Shipley ’56 of McMinnville, Feb. 5

Friends and family”

Clifford Schiel ’40 of Portland, Dec. 31

Claire Seliger, ’71. Tucker, who took a military detour before finishing his high school education, kicked off Black History Month with his inaugural State of African-American Affairs address at the University of Virginia last year.

Turner can empathize with the students he counsels. He knows life can be tough, but he makes it clear that he has high expectations. He would like to see Virginia’s African American enrollment climb to 14% to 15%; it has held steady at about 9 percent since 2000. But, he says, “When you get a critical mass, which we have at the University of Virginia, it’s much easier — when students can see other students that look like them, and see them succeeding.”

More than 40 years since his Linfield days, Turner stays in touch with his mentor, Durham, and his sophomore roommate, Barry Tucker ’71. Tucker, who took a military detour before finishing college, is Linfield’s director of Multicultural Programs.

Tucker said he considers Turner a mentor and hero. He often brought his roommate home to Seattle, Wash., on holidays when Turner couldn’t make it to Connecticut. He describes Turner as “extremely dedicated, extremely professional. He challenges all students, especially African-American students, to strive for excellence.”

— Beth Rogers Thompson

Lila Astenbrenner ’74

Rick Turner, dean of the Office of African-American Affairs, kicked off Black History Month with his inaugural State of African-American Affairs address at the University of Virginia last year.

Turner can empathize with the students he counsels. He knows life can be tough, but he makes it clear that he has high expectations. He would like to see Virginia’s African American enrollment climb to 14% to 15%; it has held steady at about 9 percent since 2000. But, he says, “When you get a critical mass, which we have at the University of Virginia, it’s much easier — when students can see other students that look like them, and see them succeeding.”

More than 40 years since his Linfield days, Turner stays in touch with his mentor, Durham, and his sophomore roommate, Barry Tucker ’71. Tucker, who took a military detour before finishing college, is Linfield’s director of Multicultural Programs.

Tucker said he considers Turner a mentor and hero. He often brought his roommate home to Seattle, Wash., on holidays when Turner couldn’t make it to Connecticut. He describes Turner as “extremely dedicated, extremely professional. He challenges all students, especially African-American students, to strive for excellence.”

— Beth Rogers Thompson