New life leads to Linfield

Putintsev, named Oregon High School Journalist of the Year in 2001, joined the Review staff as a freshman reporter and worked her way up to the top position this year. The journey has bolstered her self-confidence.

“Truly believe I can do anything,” she said. “I used to be shy and timid, and journalism has really smashed all that. I can talk to anybody about anything, and I don’t have a fear of much.”

As a sophomore, Putintsev was the youngest of 12 Oregon students to earn a prestigious Charles Snowden Internship, and she spent 10 weeks at The Tri-County News in Junction City. Stints at The Portland Observer and The Grants Pass Daily Courier strengthened her journalistic skills as well.

“One thing I’ve taken away from Linfield is that no matter what job I get into, whether within my intended major or not, I will have the ability to write and that will help me wherever I go,” she said.

She’s built strong relationships with a number of Linfield professors such as Lingle, who is her advisor and The Linfield Review advisor.

“I feel free to come talk to him whenever, and that was one of the things I was hoping for when I chose Linfield,” she said. “Not only does he know my name, he knows most everything about me.”

During her years at Linfield, Putintsev has developed a strong interest in social work, particularly in Latin American countries, and she has traveled to Costa Rica, Cuba, Spain and, in January, Russia. She’s fluent in Spanish, and can understand Russian.

Last spring, Putintsev and her family returned to Ukraine for the first time in 15 years. She visited the house where she lived, and where her aunt and grandmother still reside. The crowded city and muddy streets were a stark contrast to the idyllic memories of her childhood.

“It was another experience in my appreciation for coming back to Linfield and realizing, had my parents stayed there, what different lives we would have had,” she said. “I can’t believe my life turned out this way. Some days I walk through the campus and think, ‘I can’t believe that I’m here.’ Thank God that I got this far and I’m grateful to Linfield. I hope one day I can give back.”
