Developing Cross-Cultural Relationships

Laura Davis
Linfield College

Follow this and additional works at: http://digitalcommons.linfield.edu/linfield_magazine

Recommended Citation
Available at: http://digitalcommons.linfield.edu/linfield_magazine/vol1/iss3/11

This article is brought to you for free via open access, courtesy of DigitalCommons@Linfield. For more information, please contact digitalcommons@linfield.edu.
Linfield College students left more than a newly constructed softball field and a freshly painted mural in Mexico last spring. They also left dozens of new friends and a bit of themselves.

The 11 students, who studied in Oaxaca for the semester, spent three weeks of service learning at Pimpollo orphanage, in the southernmost part of Mexico. There they drew upon their own skills and interests to help disadvantaged children. They painted a mural, built a softball field, and taught swimming lessons, English classes and kitchen hygiene.

The three-week experience went beyond examining cross-cultural issues and strengthening Spanish language skills, according to Tom Love, Linfield professor of anthropology, who directed the program.

“It was really about developing relationships,” he said. “These types of experiences build character and develop an attitude of citizenship, mutual respect, critical self-reflection and responsibility.”

Mary Doyle ’06, a studio art and political science major, painted a mural based on more than 70 drawings created by the children. The result was a sign for the orphanage incorporating flowers and a beach scene, with the kids’ blue hand prints creating ocean waves.

“Painting is a creative outlet that encourages kids to perform acts of community service, maybe similar, maybe different. Although the names, faces and scenes change, Oscar and his neighbors will never forget the hard work of those 17 students. Nor will the Linfield students forget the experiences and lessons of those three days,” said Doyle.

As soon as the kids saw us, they would run to help us,” said Croomsan, a sociology major. “It was incredibly humbling to see how little they had and hear their stories of what they’d been through.”

“Y ou’re instantly mobbed by kids who come up and hug you,” he added. “And they care for each other. You offer one a piece of candy and he makes sure every kid has a piece of it. It’s very humbling and it makes you deeply question what’s important.”

Erica Crossman ’05, Kim McGough ’05 and Erulry Pierce ’05 constructed a softball field for the children. Croomsan still remembers the smiles on the kids’ faces when she and the other Linfield students arrived each day.

“More than anything, the experience showed Stupor how privileged she is as a United States citizen.”

She’s now more aware of how people use their resources and how it affects others around the world.

“Never had to endure hardship,” she said. “Some of the kids had very difficult lives before they came to the orphanage. It was hard to face that, but it was an incredible experience.”

– Laura Davis

Emily Pierce ’05 playing with a child.